Part 3: A student in Korea

Kasun is twenty years old and comes from Matara, a city on the south coast of Sri Lanka. Last year he won a partial scholarship to study engineering at a university in Daejeon, South Korea. Before he left, he studied Korean for six months, but when he arrived he found that people spoke much faster than his teachers in Sri Lanka.

For the first semester, Kasun took a Korean language course every morning and had engineering classes in the afternoon. The scholarship paid half of his tuition fees, so he found a part-time job in a café near the university. He worked there three evenings a week. At first he was very nervous when customers spoke to him, but after two months he could take orders without any problems.

Kasun lives in a university dormitory with a student from Mongolia. They speak Korean to each other because it is the only language they share. "It was difficult at the beginning," Kasun says, "but now my Korean is much better because I have to use it every day."

In winter the temperature in Daejeon sometimes falls below zero. Kasun had never seen snow before, and he says the first snowfall was one of the best days of his life. Next year he hopes to apply for a full scholarship.
